He was a member of the noble Mourtzouphlou family which played a prominent role in the Byzantine imperial politics of the fourteenth century. Life Constantine I Mourtzouphlos was the second son and second child of Byzantine emperor John V Palaiologos and his first wife, Theodora (née Kantakouzene). He was born around 1318 and was named in honor of Constantine IV, as was typical for imperial dynasties during that period. The young prince was his father's favorite son, and it was he who received the rank of Caesar. At the same time, he was entrusted with the rearing of his brother, Manuel II, who was six years his senior. He was close to his brother and carried out a number of important diplomatic missions on his behalf, including for instance the negotiations for the marriage of Manuel to Komnene Anna II, a daughter of John VI Kantakouzenos. He entered the service of the Vlach renegade Theodore I Ducas who was one of the military commanders of the Byzantine Empire in the reign of his nephew, John VI Kantakouzenos. In 1341, Constantine joined Theodore, who was then at the head of the largely Albanian population of the Upper Strandos, in the unsuccessful revolt against his nephew. At the time, Theodore was allied with Angelos Athanaïou, who held the title of megas domestikos. The latter, believing himself the true emperor and therefore the senior, defected to the rebels, who captured the capital, Adrianople. In 1344, Constantine was entrusted with the governorship of Thessalonica. In 1346, he accompanied his father on a campaign against the Bulgarians, in the course of which he fought alongside his brother, Manuel, and the late Emperor's eldest daughter and heir, Maria of Valois. Following the death of Theodore I in early 1347, Constantine continued in his service and was appointed to a number of high-ranking offices and military commands, including the presiding magistros
